∴ messaging

your challenge

Do your value propositions sound like everyone else's? The natural tendency is to create stories about your company and its products rather than messaging them from the customer's perspective. It's hard to break out of this trap on your own.

If you can't, then you'll unwittingly create messaging that puts you at parity with your competitors. You won't give prospects a compelling reason to do anything different from the status quo, nor will you give them any reason to decide on your solution in the short-term (rather than defer it to later or never).

sales conversations fail to address what's most important to the prospect.

what's going wrong?

- An inability to drive new demand or generate new selling opportunities leads to a smaller pipeline.
- Content and messages that don't take competitive market share lead to deals that are slow to close or stall without convincing an executive to invest now.
- Stories that don't make a compelling business case that moves executive-level decision-makers to buy now.

what if you could...

- Build stories that resonate with your prospects and clearly separate you from the status quo, as well as the competition?
- Develop messages that matter to your salespeople, increasing their confidence and competence to tell a differentiated story to your prospects?
- Avoid the commodity trap by establishing a buying vision that compels your prospects to change now?

if...

Your value propositions sound the same as everyone else's and your messages don't stand out from the competition...

You talk too much about your company and not enough about your customer...

Your opportunities stall once they reach the executive decision-maker...
